Not illustrated. 1851 Excerpt: . . . broken it to them, seeking of late to deprive them of their native liberties, and under the profession of friendship, to bring them into a miserable servitude. That they could not violate the confederacy with England, after having received from that people the greatest kindness which one nation could possibly render to another; and as to restoring the churchmen to their charges, they did not acknowledge these whom they so styled to be office-bearers in the Church, and Scotland having renounced the Pope, would maintain no longer his priests and vassals. Noailles being thus dismissed, the Earls of Morton and Glencairn returned from an embassy they had been sent on to England, highly delighted with the gracious manner in which they had been treated, and the assurances of assistance they had received from Elizabeth to enable them to defend their liberties should they at any time...
